Acknowledgements

Although we are increasingly encouraged to perceive ourselves (and each other) as competing entrepreneurs rather than colleagues with a common purpose, at the end of the day all academic work is a collective effort. Of course, this book is no exception to this. Although I alone am responsible for the content of this book, many people have contributed to it in a variety of ways. The list of colleagues, but also friends, comrades and family members, who have made it possible for me to write this book is so long that it would be impossible to mention everyone.

I initially started to write on prefigurative politics as a philosophy student at Radboud University in the immediate wake of the Egyptian revolution of 2011, and continued to explore this concept and its political relevance as a visiting researcher at the Centre for Applied Philosophy, Politics, and Ethics (CAPPE) at the University of Brighton (2011–12). I would like to thank my friends and colleagues at CAPPE, and Bob Brecher, Mark Devenney and Andy Knott in particular, for the many engaging discussions we have had over the past years and for their valuable feedback to my work. In the following years, I continued to explore the meaning and relevance of prefiguration as a PhD student at the Institute of Philosophy at KU Leuven (2012–17). I am much indebted to my supervisor Tim Heysse for his wise advice and his good-spirited support and encouragement. Tim has given me all the freedom to pursue my own research interests and always kept believing in it. I have very fond memories of our many discussions on Hannah Arendt, Claude Lefort, Walter Benjamin and other political theorists who have come to (re)shape my philosophical views in the course of these years. As well as Tim and my co-supervisor Evert van der Zweerde, I want to thank the members of my examination committee – Antoon Braeckman, Robin Celikates and Dimitris Gakis – for their valuable feedback and for encouraging me to further pursue my research on prefigurative democracy. I am also very grateful to all my colleagues and friends at RIPPLE (Research in Political Philosophy Leuven) for creating such an intellectually stimulating environment in which my ideas on prefigurative democracy could come to fruition. They are too numerous to mention everyone, but there is one person to whom I owe a word of thanks in particular: it was Anya Topolski who convinced me to study Hannah Arendt's work in light of my project on prefigurative politics. Anya has continued to be an inspiring friend and supportive colleague for many years now, and she has given valuable input for, and feedback to, various parts of this book. As part of my PhD project, I had the pleasure of being a Fulbright scholar at the New School for Social Research in New York in 2015. I am particularly grateful to my host Andreas Kalyvas, and to Simon Critchley, Banu Bargu and the Theory Collective for the many engaging discussions and inspiring seminars.

Published online by Cambridge University Press

In 2016 I returned to my alma mater Radboud University to teach political philosophy. I am very thankful for the support that I have received from the Faculty of Philosophy, Theology and Religious Studies and from my colleagues at the department of Ethics and Political Philosophy and the Radboud Centre for Philosophy and Society. I especially want to express my gratitude to Evert van der Zweerde, who has been my mentor since I was a student and served as a co-supervisor during my PhD. Not only has Evert always been a great example to me, in many respects, but he has also planted the seeds of several ideas and insights that I have sought to develop in this book. Last but not least, I would like to thank my students at Radboud University, who have never tired of challenging my ideas and with whom I have had countless inspiring discussions on democracy, anarchism, protest and social movements, and many other interesting topics.

This book could not have been written without the help and advice of the editors of this wonderful book series: Alex Thomson, Benjamin Arditi and Andrew Schaap. Their suggestions have been of great help in both shaping the structure of this book and in articulating its central argument. I especially want to thank Andrew for his detailed feedback and insightful comments to an earlier version of the manuscript. I also want to thank Jen Daly, Ersev Ersoy and Sarah Foyle of Edinburgh University Press for their invaluable support at various stages of the writing and editing process. Parts of this book and various of its chapters have been presented at a number of conferences, workshops and seminars. I would like to mention a few friends and colleagues who have contributed to my understanding of prefigurative democracy, who provided a space (both inside and outside of academia) in which I could share and develop my ideas on this topic, or with whom I have collaborated during the past years. Among them are Robin Celikates, Brecht de Smet, Lisa Disch, Matthias Flatscher, Sara Gebh, Femke Kaulingfreks, Sonja Lavaert, Johny Lenaerts, Daniel Loick, Fred Louckx, Oliver Marchart, Vivienne Matthies-Boon, Paul Raekstad, Enzo Rossi, Guido Ruivenkamp, Peter-Ben Smit, Peter Snowdon, Dan Swain, Thomas Swann, Nadia Urbinati, Mariecke van den Berg, Dominique Willaert, and many others. With Gaard Kets, Laura Roth, Ramón Feenstra, Carolien van Ham and Evert van der Zweerde I have recently embarked on a new and related project on communalism as a democratic repertoire (which was generously funded by the Gerda Henkel Stiftung).

Published online by Cambridge University Press

I have also received so much help, support and inspiration from many people outside of academia. I would like to thank my political comrades, especially the members of Doorbraak and my friends and former housemates at De Grote Broek, from whom I have learned more about politics and prefiguration than any academic study could possibly teach me. Although they often took interest in my attempts to understand the world, they also kept reminding me that the point still is to change it. Kladderadatsch taught me that if you can't dance there is no point in having a revolution. No less meaningful and significant was the unconditional support of my parents Dimphy and Jos van de Sande, my sisters Merlijn and Celine and their partners, and the Geerlings family. Finally, the person most deserving of my gratitude is my partner and best friend Jolien Geerlings. Words cannot express how thankful I am to share my life with such a brilliant, powerful, politically and intellectually inspiring person. It simply would have been impossible to write this book without her loving care, continuous encouragement and critical advice. Our children Lex and Polle are not only the main reason why it took much longer than anticipated to finish the book, but also the best one I could possibly imagine. Much like the activists whose experiences I have tried to grasp in the following pages, I wish that our precious time together will last forever.

*

Published online by Cambridge University Press

Chapter 5 has appeared in a different version as ‘They Don’t Represent Us? Synecdochal Representation and the Politics of Occupy Movements’, in Constellations (Van de Sande 2020). I thank the editors and reviewers of Constellations for their valuable feedback to earlier versions of this piece.

Published online by Cambridge University Press

Published online by Cambridge University Press